the quiet and more assured condition of the Empire has had something to do with this change of opinion, or it may be that the golden prospect afforded by the development of the mines has caused this anticipated danger to grow faint and remote. The whole course of Chinese policy, and the history of their recent dealings with foreigners combine to produce much present of Dr. Corcoran Salazar's proposals being favourably entertained. The authorities previously opposed the construction of the Poochong-Amoy telegraph until they had negotiated for its transmission to their control and ownership, and we believe they will, as far as possible, place obstacles in the way of foreign enterprise of this kind and kindred descriptions. In China, the Government of Peking are not inclined to adopt improvements, or to open up the resources of the country, but some far-sighted officials, who cannot resist the inducements which they are constantly brought into contact with, and whose increasing knowledge of Western power and civilisation compel them to admit their own shortcomings in various respects, urge, from time to time, upon them the necessity of condescending to learn from the "barbarians." What is done, however, is usually effected by Chinese means, and the tendency to keep the opportunities of developing wealth in Chinese hands grows stronger. Dr. Corcoran Salazar will probably find this out soon enough. It will be admitted that the opening up of the coal mines will be a good thing, but he will at the same time be informed that it can be done by Chinese money and Chinese labour. We may of course be wrong, but recent and significant events have led us to form this opinion.

The ship Atlantic, from Hongkong, docked at San Francisco on the 14th inst., and at once commenced to discharge.

The Malacca correspondence of the Singapore Times says that letters of Administration to the Estate of a wealthy Chinese Merchant who died there a few months ago, worth about $100,000, are being applied for by the Chinese heirs, and that the amount of 2 per cent. was not less than $2,000.
